

The law refers to all the norms and rules developed by society to keep social order and it is, therefore, everywhere, shaping our behaviour and views on morality. This attracts me to the study of law. For as long as I can remember, I have been passionate about becoming lawyer as I would always think analytically, looking at both sides of each argument. This led me to join the Debate Mate programme shortly after moving to England; I was an active participant of the team and, alongside my peers, we won the County Debate Mate Tournament and ranked 8th in the whole of the country- a major accomplishment as we represented one of the poorest performing schools in the UK and we competed against extremely high performing schools. Such experience taught me to detach myself from topics, arguing passionately even when my opinion clashed with the motion.

My desire to study law was amplified when I joined the Pathways to Law programme. It allowed me to attend law seminars and speak to current law students which allowed me to gain an insight to the study of law at University. Throughout the programme I found myself feeling excited at the seminars because of how interesting I found the content and having countless questions for the students. Pathways to law also developed my communication and teamwork skills by requiring me to work with peers to present the impact of Brexit in immigration which allowed me to take a current affair and apply it in a legal context.

My determination to overcome the challenges of living in an extremely socio-economically deprived area and moving to a new country with its own language and culture, which stops many from applying to university, led me to join the Realising Opportunity programme. The RO programme familiarised me with new skills required to study at University, such as conducting academic research and effective referencing as I completed the Academic Assignment. I focused my assignment on the need for tougher gun laws in America to tackle the current gun crisis which permitted me to look at a topic from its legal context.

During my placement with the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS), I became aware of the current issues in law such as disclosure, which has become a crucial matter that has damaged the CPS reputation, as well the need to update the law due to new technological advantages such as the internet which helped me see the law as an evolving matter rather than a static concept. I also spent some of my placement in a Crown court shadowing a prosecutor which helped me recognise and develop the skills needed to become a lawyer like confidence, dedication and the ability to work efficiently as sometimes new cases would have to be prepared in a short amount of time.

I am confident that I am suitable for the course as I am a very independent and self-motivated student exemplified by my routine whilst in Sixth Form where I would revise everything learned each day until I was comfortable with it as well as frequently attending booster sessions to solidify my knowledge. My dedication and relentless effort meant that I was frequently congratulated by my teachers and peers for my dedication and strong work ethic; I was even awarded the Margaret Bryce Award for my performance during my GCSEs as well as the Effort and Attainment Award while studying my A-levels.

Alongside my eagerness to study law, I am also very interested in politics and keeping up to date with current affairs around the world which led me to participate in the 2017 European Youth Parliament where my peers and I debated current issues at the time, including Brexit and the supplying of weapons to Saudi Arabia. This instilled in me the ability to research new topics extensively to debate about and encouraged me to be more politically aware. Another hobby of mine is forming part of a volleyball team. This helped me become a stronger, more confident person as I trained with older, more experienced players that intimidated me. However, now, I have developed friendships with many of them and I am not afraid to speak out in any situation.
