

For the purpose of this letter, the actual name has been replaced with “Candidate”.

Dear Sir/Madam,

In this letter I would like to recommend Candidate for a Master's program in Psychology at UCL. I am writing as the Project Manager of the Youth Well-Being Research Center, where Candidate participated as a research assistant during our most recent internship cycle. Our work involved analysing patterns of stress, social belonging, and digital behaviour among secondary-school students across the region. Candidate joined our team for a four-month period, which was then extended to additional two months of part-time work, and contributed to both the data-collection and preliminary analysis stages.

Candidate's primary responsibilities included conducting structured interviews with participants, thematically analysing the responses, and presenting the results to the rest of the team. He handled interviews with professionalism and sensitivity, an essential requirement given the nature of the topics discussed, which frequently involved self-esteem, family stressors, and peer dynamics. In addition to assigned tasks, Candidate started to play a key role in our planning meetings, where he proposed the expansion of our current program to new neighbourhoods and age groups. He even led the first operations of the project, that is now being continued by the rest of the team. This shows his ambition and willingness to think outside the box when implementing new solutions.

Based on Candidate's performance and their thoughtful engagement with the psychological dimensions of our work, I believe they are well suited for graduate-level study in psychology. They approached their responsibilities with maturity, consistency, and an evident interest in understanding human behaviour. I am confident they would bring the same level of professionalism to your master's programme. Please feel free to contact me should you need further information.
