

Beyond concrete ideas, I am intrigued by the deeper visualisation of thoughts – similar to our recreation of a character in a fantasy that is guided only by the clues on the text. Graphic design signifies to me the freedom to externalise these inner visualisations constrained only by our imagination.

In seeking to redefine the limits of my imagination, and thus of my creations, I constantly pursue opportunities to develop my creative persona. Indeed, I have acted as the media designer of the student council in my school for three years in a row. From smaller projects such as simple posters for fundraising events to larger ones, such as the founding and creative direction of the school's newspaper, I have continuously merged fact with aesthetic to externalise the personality and purpose sought by the council. In fact, through my creations, I seek to reflect more than the basic knowledge, but a deeper visual understanding of the information given to me.

Nonetheless, my motivation behind a degree in graphic design is that, in today's digital world and social media, the importance of visual material is as prominent as ever. From grabbing attention of customers to promoting a global cause, graphic materials are consistently used as a powerful tool to effectively communicate a message.

I experienced this first hand during my 60-day social media internship at Company Name, where I managed the company's social platforms. I efficiently created engaging content which went beyond bare fact but sought to appeal to the audience's attention. I sought to express the personal brand of Company Name whilst at the same time allowing for flexibility and variety which allowed me to test techniques that were favoured by the algorithm and kept content interesting and organic. Similarly, in my school's Project, I prepared materials such as presentations, posters and graphics calling for an eco-friendly future that ultimately led to my school being commended as Local Authority Award.

Throughout my degree, I hope to further explore techniques and artists who have influenced my journey. Indeed, I am fascinated by architecture and how space can be used to communicate a type of fragility and connection to nature and the environment around it. In this area, I am truly inspired by the work of Gaudi. In particular, I admire how he refrained from applying standard rules, choosing instead to use architecture to express his own thoughts and personality as shown in Parque Güell. Also in Barcelona, I am similarly fascinated by the Sagrada Familia Cathedral and its various symbolism, from representing bones of the human body to a forest. I appreciate the creative choice of taking a building with a specific purpose, a religious cathedral, yet infusing it with something that resembles the living world, whether human or natural.

Outside of graphics, I am an individual that seeks to connect to the communities around me. I have participated in multiple exchanges offered by Erasmus+ in Countries that have allowed me to appreciate the beauty of different cultures and learn from the different perspectives that are present even in a prima facie cohesive group. Similarly, I am characterised by my commitment, determination, and fearlessness, traits I've prominently demonstrated in sports. From my dedication to Sport and Sport, where precision and focus are paramount, to the adrenaline in Sport, I've learned to navigate challenges with resilience.
